Photoshop CS2 and CS3 do not let you import TIFF images. Working with the Blending Modes Blending modes can turn an image into a translucent piece of art. The most commonly used modes are Multiply, Screen, Overlay, Hard Mix, Soft Light, Pin Light, Darken, Lighten, and Hue. (We discuss some of these modes in Chapter 14.) Using the Brush The Brush is the image-editing tool that enables you to paint an image, creating a new layer or mask. The Brush is a tool that, when it's created with any color, allows you to paint pixels with a color, and even use a gradation of colors. You can use the Brush to add texture to images and paintings. You can use it to paint with brushstrokes, like some styles of calligraphy or western painting. The Brush enables you to undo and redo strokes, as well as move, rotate, scale, and resize the Brush as you work on an image. The Brush is essential to creating realistic-looking, artistic effects in digital photography. You can convert the Brush into an airbrush, where you can paint with a range of colors, including mixing colors to create a color gradient. You can use the Brush on the following layers: Background layer: You create a new layer called the Background layer. You then erase that layer to reveal the original background. Layer thumbnail: You create a new layer called a Layer Thumbnail. Layer mask: You create a new layer mask, apply a blend mode, and paint to the Layer Mask. If you work with layers extensively, you may find it useful to create a Layer Thumbnail each time you start a new image. This enables you to add layers and use a layer mask as you work, without having to keep the layers you've created open. Using Paths The Path tool enables you to create a vector path that defines the shape of an image, creating a unique shape that can be edited without bleeding. The Path tool is also a wonderful tool for creating textural effects or adding interesting patterns to images. You can create a path by using the Selection tool and moving the pointer around on the image, but, unlike the Brush, you're not constrained by the selection that you make. To create a path, select the path command from the Paths panel to display the panel (Figure 7-2) or type Path

Image copyright Getty Images Google has agreed to pay $90m (£70.2m) to resolve a US class action alleging it deceived consumers into buying its services. The sum represents the money consumers were told by Google that they would be charged, whether they used its services or not. The Californian firm said it settled the case to avoid the risk of continuing litigation. Google said the case was not about competition, but about whether the user agreement was clear about its data storage practices. Thousands of Google users are also involved in a Canadian class action. "Users may not realise it, but data and content they give to Google is stored by Google and controlled by Google," explains Alan Davidson, a lawyer who represents Google's customers. "The reality is that Google owns and controls the data and content. So users may be surprised when they learn they have been sharing this data and content with Google." Google refers to the deal as a "settlement". The $90m payment is a lump sum that will have to be distributed among the class members. But class members will only receive a share of that money if they complete the claims form and return it within 18 months of the settlement being filed. The settlement will be in US dollars. "There are probably a lot of people outside of the US that can't get dollars," says Mr Davidson. Google's "like-minded" settlement partners are still in discussion about a percentage of the cash. When it agreed the deal, Google's legal advisers maintained that this wasn't a legal agreement for a payment, but a written agreement to avoid the risk of continuing legal action. Does Google's settlement agreement mean that it has admitted its data storage practices to be wrong? "It's probably better for people to be careful and follow the instructions that are given in the agreement," says Professor Marcus Wohlsen, a competition law expert at the London School of Economics. "If you misuse the services, I think it could be hard to escape the consequences. It would probably be harder to make a case if you are a consumer and the service is bad. "If you use the service and you're not happy with the service, then yes, [you] would have a case. But you have to do it right," he says. "But if you use it and you aren't happy with the service, if it's bad enough to
