CorePack Assassin., supported by limited clinical trial evidence, to enable us to understand how the benefits are to be achieved and sustained. "Factors that are known to promote recovery after stroke and reduce disability include (i) rehabilitation interventions; (ii) a need for inter-disciplinary care; and (iii) health and social care services providing safe, effective, coordinated, person-centred, timely, and cost-effective care. These factors are supported by high quality clinical and cost effectiveness data. This systematic review found that individualised occupational therapy and physiotherapy services may have some benefits, but not enough to be considered cost effective. It is not clear if these findings are due to the provision of individualised services, or if the study methods are not sufficiently rigorous. A crucial systematic review on stroke rehabilitation, commissioned by the Commissioning Support Unit (CSU) and the Commissioning Advisory Group (CAG) for Rehabilitation, provides a more robust and comprehensive narrative overview of the evidence, which indicates that there is no strong evidence for the provision of individualised services by therapists in terms of improving function or disability. Further research needs to be conducted to help answer key questions about whether individualised occupational therapy and physiotherapy (particularly for those on personal budgets) leads to improved outcomes after stroke, and whether these outcomes can be sustained over the longer term. New quantitative clinical trials, targeting disability reduction and other patient outcomes, should be conducted to understand whether individuals receive more benefit than people with stroke-like conditions in standard care; if and how personal budgets affect outcomes; and what outcomes are more or less sensitive
