I am trying to have a method determine which number a decimal is closest to by starting by rounding up the number, then adding.9999 up to.99999999 up to the 100th decimal, then having the method print out the decimal position at each decimal point where the number is closest to the target number. For example, if the target number is 1.91, the second-closest decimal to 1.91 is 1.9000001 and the third-closest decimal is 1.9000003. What I have tried is: public static int closestDecimal(double d, double e) { int i = ((int) d); int j = i; if (e > d) { while (i != d) { j = ((int) (j + 1.0)); i = i + 0.1; System.out.println(j); } } return j; } However, when I compile this, it says that the method closestDecimal(double d, double e) is not valid. Can someone help me? A: Two issues: j cannot be declared as int, it needs to be double j would become double rather than int because i = i + 0.1; doubles If you want to round up, then you would need to change the logic to

What's new:

12. In Time of Peril On a stormy night, the Shate-king of Despair regained the heights of Pain. It had been a bittersweet day for him, witnessing the slaughter of an old friend. The confrontation had been an easy one; his guardians had been made to fall in droves. His new companion had even been so fortunate as to be slain by his brute of a brother. Now he could rest with true satisfaction. A rush of wings pierced the darkness above him, with the faintest of creaks left as a shocked silence. There were at least ten of them, no doubt. He smiled. Never had he heard of such magic in the world. They must have been able to fly in this rain, a feat known only in the legends of the Shate-king of Despair. A moment later, the vanguard of the ten attacks swirled out of the skies and soared towards the ground in unison. The attack was fated, as it always was, to crash into a fissure in the mountain that held the Impaler Mage as one of its many chambers. For a moment, a flash of light ignited a shot of air as the underside of the rock came alight. Black volcanic stone was never supposed to hold magics of this kind. Soon there were six winged figures still standing. "Why did you come back, mon ami?" The king of despair could see his new companion's expression. How he felt about his presence was abundantly clear. The Shate-king did not indulge in pointless words, but to see such pain all of the while receiving gifts. He spoke gently; and replied slowly; to hide his intent of the edges of a razor as he moved, to cut deep. "To let you leave, and to take your place. There is no future for me now. You can keep the mantle of adversity." "But you have memories - " "And a hate that fades slowly with time. But enough. I shall see you in a year from now." "I would rather die now." his companion replied, his face was a mask of longing, but dark fury in dark eyes shone. "I understand," said the Shate-king. The four remaining hunters continued forward; and to the east of Agniz. Within they could hear the distant screaming of bulls locked in death. These beasts had been the Sh

I have a form containing a field, like name, that may already contain value. Now I want to add a validation like if the field is empty, then an error message (This field should not be empty.) would appear. Following the docs, I added the rules: {required:true, validates:validation_method_to_validate}, which works great until I change the fields value. The error message disappears after I have typed something into the field. Then in the validator method, I check the rules: return!($.inArray('some_name', rules) > -1); This seems stupid that the validation script is skipping the rules check because they passed the field check. Is there a way to use the rules validation to validate only some elements of the form? A: You're completely right. You'll find more info about validation approach here: What you should do is to exclude some elements of the form from validation, by giving such elements a class instead of a rule. Such a class can be applied to specific elements with its corresponding attribute. Check out this section in the documentation to see how to do that. To sum up, you must be aware of the distinction between elements being validated and rules. You don't have to use the rules for elements, they are for rules. Have fun Q: Is it possible to evaluate a polymorphic function in the heap? Consider this scenario. We have a generic function that is modified based on a parameter. The parameter is specified inside the function definition itself. We can call this function in a polymorphic way, e.g.: int fun(int&) {} template std::string fun(
