Neuroprotective Effects of Ketamine in Chronic Alcoholism-Induced Depression. Psychostimulants and antidepressants have been successfully used to mitigate the symptoms of depression in chronic alcoholics; however, the mechanisms underlying these effects are still not clear. The aim of the present study was to investigate the behavioral and neurochemical effects of ketamine administration in two chronic, binge-ethanol-induced depression models in male Wistar rats. In the first series of experiments, 75% ethanol was administered in a binge-ethanol-feeding protocol to induce depression in rats. The administration of ketamine (25 mg/kg, i.p.) resulted in a significant improvement in the forced swimming test in the ethanol group.

In the second experiment, we also tested the effect of 20-day administration of ethanol in a subchronic binge-ethanol model. Neurochemical and behavioral studies were conducted in brain tissues after 20 days of ethanol exposure.

Ketamine (25 mg/kg, i.p.) administered in both models was found to improve the depression-like behavior. The present study demonstrates the potential antidepressant effect of ketamine in two chronic alcohol-induced depression models and further
