is a Barred Owl on the scrubby hill side. Evening light and dusk brings a lot of different behaviours as there are all kinds of habitat and animals to see. 10.09.2015 I have been dabbling in a lot of technical ways to stop the deterioration of trees in my garden. I used to enjoy pruning, but I guess I am getting too old for it, but it is still fun to throw sticks at trees and just watch the results. Here are some prunings from the garden which survived and other trees which did not. 10.03.2015 This is going to be a while a long one, but I wanted to share as I am sure lots of people have heard of a certain person, who you may think of first as a leader, if they ever get themselves into public office. We can never get too much of a good thing, so I hope you enjoy this story and maybe it will inspire some of you to be active and grass roots. About ten years ago I attended a political rally where a rural Australian town had decided to vote in a sheep station owner as their local member. He was to inherit an elected position and many people in the town were quite excited about the prospect of this eccentric farrier taking on the responsible of the government. He was the only one of the candidates who was willing to talk to the assembled crowd. His opening remarks were akin to telling the workers of the factory that if they lost the contract with a customer, it would mean that the position was redundant. They would lose their job, but not their employer's undying gratitude. You could, of course, see where he was going with this. When the meeting was over and the doors opened, everyone knew the man would be their representative in parliament. All the outside public knew was that the politician was a huge fan of sheep, happy farming and that he had a degree in accounting. The rest was open to the imagination. Months later I was stood on a hill overlooking the town at dusk, when I heard a cawing and the sounds of a flock of birds settling down for the night. As I was about to turn away and go home to bed, I caught a glimpse of something moving in the lower part of the tree cover, something which looked like the silhouette of a tree frog. I watched the silhouette move about, hunting for worms in the duff and pondering the usual

Latent fingerprints can be used to quickly identify suspects or victims of crimes, and are considered a hallmark of human identity. Latent fingerprint analysis is used extensively in criminal investigations and in forensics investigations. Criminal investigators collect fingerprints in hopes that these collected prints are in some way connected to a suspect, victim, or other item of evidence in a crime. Forensic scientists may also collect latent fingerprints from scenes of crimes and from a victim's person and attempt to identify the source of the prints. Latent fingerprints are acquired from a variety of sources. In a typical arrest scenario, a suspect is presented to a criminal justice professional (e.g., a police officer) who swabs or otherwise collects a latent print from the suspect's finger. In some instances, the criminal justice professional may introduce a substrate (e.g., a piece of paper or card) that a suspect touches before providing a print. For instance, a criminal justice professional may ask a suspect to push his or her finger against a sheet of paper to provide a print. Latent prints are easily misidentified if the individual has recently washed or washed his or her hands. Consequently, individuals are often encouraged to refrain from washing their hands (or, if they choose to wash their hands, to wash their hands for a short period of time) before providing a print. Individuals are often uncomfortable providing prints before washing their hands. Individuals may further be uncomfortable using a drying agent or other residue on a substrate to collect a print from a substrate. If the criminal justice professional does not encourage a suspect to refrain from washing his or her hands, the suspect may wash his or her hands before providing a print. If a suspect wishes to wash his or her hands, but does not have access to an adequate substrate upon which a print may be collected, the suspect may resort to using a tissue or napkin. These substrates are often sticky, which may further promote the risk of latent fingerprints being misidentified.
