Created by Ark Performance - a global group with a variety of new games, Ark performance will focus on developing two new RPG games with Baldy's team, Ark Performance. "In RPG games that offer a variety of choices, a new possibility is provided through the complex interface between dialogues and choices," ARK Perfomance said. "However, we have been designing the interface so that the player's choice is judged only by the way they play, and not by their purpose. Hence, we have decided to focus on the overall experience with the game and develop Baldy's story and Baldy's world as the most important element in the game. "We will be releasing the game under the title Tarnished Legend after merging Baldy's and Ark Performance's existing titles. We are currently designing the game with a strong focus on the world and characters, to create the game's potential as a game that offers a variety of choices." "We are very excited to be able to develop an RPG based on such a unique story," Baldy said. "The deep world and characters of the game are also what we and our developers are most passionate about. We are also constantly creating new and fun content to help players enjoy playing the game." On our first run we got to level 12 and the screen locked up. It took us a couple of tries to get it going again, only to have it lock up. Q: How do I know if a segment of a line of code is being called in ASP.NET WebForms? I have something like this var number= Math.Cos(Math.Round(1.0/0.0)); And I want to know, at compile time, if this is being called. If it is, I want to produce a warning, and if it isn't, a compiler error. I know I can try to do something like this, but I don't want to rely on the error being displayed to me. I want to be sure I don't do this: var x= 0/0; A: If you need compile time checking you need to use compile time assertions. Here is a sample using the CompileTimeAssertions NuGet package using Microsoft.CodeAnalysis; [CompileTimeAssertion] public void CompileTimeAssertion() { } You will get a warning (or compilation error) if the expression is invalid at compile time. Q: Creating a struct from a base class without the base class Let's say I have the following: struct Base { int m_Int; void* m_pMemory; }; struct Derived : public Base { const char* m_pName; int m_Int; }; And now I have a pre-defined value for m_Int and m_pMemory for Derived. But I also want to provide a default value for m_Int. If I define Derived in the following way, it will work: struct Base { int m_Int; void* m_pMemory; }; struct Derived : public Base { const char* m_pName; }; But then I will get a warning if I try to change m_pMemory: m_pMemory is declared as a pointer to a void. Is it possible to somehow create a struct without the base class? A: You can't. There is a proposal in ISO C++ to add a destructor and conversion functions for base class subobjects to the standard library:
