[NO! There are idiots in the Original Posting site!]

I first started with screenshots of the development platform to help me quickly identify the errors that were showing up, since good feedback from actual gameplay is really hard to get without spending a month before playing. I've recently bought the May 2003 patch so my game will be up to date with the current status. Expect the game to go online sometime on or after May 1. The FAQ "registering for a domain name" page is also up, with a list of all you do need to buy to use the domain name to setup a web site. Best Ewok in VA! I've learned a lot with all this, Read the FAQs... also when this gets posted on the boards, try [The RPGDldr [[email deleted]](#)

Re: Urge Over You have achieved wisdom in miniature. You have learned that many ways are right when it comes to the tabletop. Urge Over is a multipurpose rule that helps you to advance some of the same good character options you've always wanted, but to be more efficient about it. "Urge Over" offers more freedom and lower barriers with the functions of Urge and Inspired. "Urge Over" recognizes a potential power in each gamer, and lets you develop a character better suited to you and more dangerous to the opponent. "Urge Over" is designed to optimize game play with a setup that allows any RPG player to participate at a high level. "Urge Over" rewards a player who is emotionally involved in the game while giving the warrior a chance to shine in character interaction and combat.[Pregat] Re: Urge the gray matter included in the white matter ROI ([@B10], [@B13]). Previous fMRI research has found that a particularly negative response to viewing affective faces appears in this area of the cerebellum ([@B14], [@B15]), and hippocampal activation has been reported during memory processing ([@B9], [@B16]). We did not find significant activation in the cerebellum or hippocampus with the task used in this study. As the global effect of emotion in our study might be more diffuse, these results might also be explained by a lack of sensitivity. Importantly, we found no effect of emotion on the interaction of the primary motor cortex and cerebellum, and the interaction of the cerebellum and inferior frontal gyrus. If the cerebellum and the inferior frontal gyrus are important for the emotion-cognition interaction, we might have found an effect of valence in a more posterior part of the cerebellum or in the inferior frontal gyrus or in both regions. The most interesting result was the effect of valence of the face stimuli on the left fusiform gyrus. This interaction might suggest that the fusiform gyrus is part of the core network of emotion recognition that is probably modulated by the interaction of emotion perception and motor knowledge. Anatomically, this might be reflected in the body representation, as described by the ventral stream of the visual cortex. The fusiform gyrus is part of the occipital-temporal cortex and has been suggested to be involved in the visual representation of bodies ([@B17], [@B18]). Given that faces and bodies share many cues to affect, the visual representation of both body and face cues is expected to activate the fusiform gyrus. We speculate that the observation of emotional faces modulates the response of the fusiform gyrus in the perception of the body, and the motor expertise subsequently modulates the response of the fusiform gyrus in the perception of the affective value of the face. This might be demonstrated in a study with a more precise measure of body representation, such as a multivoxel pattern classification analysis ([@B19]). In conclusion, this study demonstrates an effect of emotion in higher level representations of the face, the association of the emotion to a primary effect of "valence" in the face was consistent with our hypothesis that we might be able to recognize the emotional value of facial expressions in a predictive manner
