2:31 War on Terror book review: A Bloody BusinessBy William Blum War on Terror book review: A Bloody BusinessBy William Blum War on Terror book review: A Bloody BusinessBy William Blum In 2001 the U.S. and Britain spearheaded the invasion of Iraq which was justified by many as a measure to disarm Saddam Hussein. This essay will demonstrate how there is insufficient evidence that this was the case. It will be argued that the true motivation was the quest for oil. Zimmerman's testimony was clearly slanted, and this video by a psychiatrist shows his repeated lies. I scored a patrol mission on the Xbox 360 version of Modern Warfare 2. I had the US Marines, and was partnered with a computer-controlled teammate. I'll run through the basics, with a focus on the tactics employed. I completed the mission as US Marines and with a comrade. Before starting, I played the first half, customizing an infantry grunt outfitted with an M4 Carbine, an M203 Grenade, and a frag grenade. I also got myself two Comms pieces and a Combat Knife. I activated a Fireteam, and elected to work the objective on my own. The first objective was to work a pick-up point as Marines, and then to find an injured person inside a nearby building. After crossing the bridge, I met up with my teammate, and we split our resources. I marked the objective on the minimap as "capture" and started to scout ahead. There was a small concrete ditch, and in front of it stood a building with a pair of larger concrete towers. I legged to the very edge of the ditch and planted a frag grenade. I waited for an enemy to appear, but nobody came. I then moved to the large concrete room, and found a Marine assaulting the main door. I opened fire on him, but he died too quickly for me to kill. Another enemy appeared in the southern towers, and I started to flank him. I was successful, and there was an adjacent 3-way corridor. Just as I was about to take the enemy out, he shot me, killing me instantly. In the next room I took out a sniper who killed my comrade. I ducked into the map room, and once again

October 10, 2007 October 10, 2007 9:09pm By the time Ballistic M.A.D.ness report rolls around, most listeners have pretty much written four captains off, but we can at least count on one familiar face – Pertinax Leon – for a spot of electioneering. Leon's first big chance comes as he first confronts Marx Kibaki, the eminently bien-pensant humble rural peasant who won the presidency, with the results of the recent elections over, and his team already in situ, thereby taking up a prime post in government in Nairobi, where not all is well; of course, this was before the Presidency election, and the other polls, and virtually all the locally orientated constituencies came out to beat off William Ruto. A man he looks and sounds very different from his opponent at this stage, the self-satisfied and often intimidating Marxist Captain General who impressed so many Africans and non-Africans both during his years as an MP, and when he was Keeper of the Privy Purse, no less, turning his back on the Tories' John Key. He called for the banning of firearms, of course, saying that "people are saying: a citizen can choose to defend himself," but he's also a guy who's managed to simultaneously achieve the highest office of the state, and then be seen as one of the most corrupt of those who've entered that august office. Anyway, Leon confronts Kibaki with the facts, and Kibaki has to respond. It's worth sifting through the script a little, to get a sense of the populist tone and libertarian values that'll inform Leon's campaign for the Presidency. Kibaki's going to be fighting an uphill battle. Leon's immediately laying down his views on drug policy, for example, which is commonplace in the M.A.D. days now: "Prohibition had nothing to do with these shootings," Leon says, "Your approach was to force people to use fewer drugs." He's well aware of the "fear factor" that's been at the background of Kenya's gun crime, and says that people are going to read the polls as approval of what they did. He points out that the Convention of States has been busy in South America, but that immigrants to that continent often bring the same customs from their countries of origin. I interviewed the list's co-founder,
