Kung Fu Action Battle is a card game. It is a tactical card game. The game is played over several rounds, during which two teams of players, Chinese (Red Dragon and Blue Tiger) take turns to choose and play weapon cards to affect the battle of their opponents (Victory and Defeat). Cards on each player's hands are used to form a spell, which may cause different damage to the opponents. The goal of the game is to win as many rounds as possible. In Kung Fu Action Battle, there are 48 weapon cards in total. The game consists of 4 different classes of cards: Weapon cards, Power cards, Monsters cards, and Equipment cards. Each class has different effect on the battle. The rules of the game are as follows: - Weapons Cards are the main cards in the game, they directly affect the outcome of battles. The number of weapon cards in the player's hand determines the type and number of weapon cards that can be used in a given round. Only one weapon card can be played in a turn. - Power Cards are cards that can only be played after a Weapon card is played. In the game, Power cards have different effects to affect the battle. To win as many rounds as possible, the player's emphasis is on the power cards during the battle. - Monster Cards are a special kind of cards which require higher level of martial arts to summon. Monsters cards have a set range of attack power. Players with lower level martial arts can summon certain number of monsters cards to deal damage to the opponent. - Equipment Cards are items which can be equipped to Martial Artist. Equipment cards boost the attribute of its Martial Artist. The player uses the attributes of the Martial Artist to summon more Equipment Cards. What's new in Thunder Helix:

Bacteria Vaccine Study I've been thinking about this for a while. We have couple dogs that are friendly to us and generally friendly to pretty much everyone, but one in particular we don't want to take out to meet strangers. He is guard dog and tends to be aggressive towards newcomers. Thankfully, this dog is pretty mellow most of the time, but like some dogs, the bad days and the extremes of temperature and food he just don't like very well. We had him almost 2 years ago and he's gradually gotten better, but did not become a "happy dog" all of a sudden after a series of infusions. Intestinal and oral samples from various animals – dogs and cats – have been routinely taken since we first had him. It all began years ago from the process of identifying what kind of bacteria are in a person's gut at the moment of their death, and combining that with the idea that certain types of bacteria help shape the immune system in a person, in a theory by Dr. Ian Duncan called "the commensal hypothesis of immunity". The most obvious point is for us to find out what those bacteria might be, but there was the significant aspect that (just like in humans) not all species of bacteria that are found in a person's body are actually the same and healthy. Most people are not healthy. We'd know only the result of the exposure to their bacteria if they did encounter a dangerous or unhealthy agent. But what if you can influence the bacterial population to shift towards more bacteria that would help? My thoughts were this: Think about cats and dogs versus pigs and cows in public health. Most of the domesticated animals have a pretty similar makeup of bacteria in their digestive system, so we could with reasonable effort (perhaps a massive change in taste, or conditioning and grooming) train them to a similar base of bacteria. But the dogs are big players in our social dynamics. We want them to be nice to us because we eat them. We want them to be all-right with the kids, because they'll be all-right with us. I found a story on naturalnews.com with a link to a study, from UCLA, that showed evidence that there was bacteria in the mouth (it was in the throat specifically, and oral samples were taken in the study) that were really likely to have a positive influence on individuals. They theorized
