Typical fluidic peristaltic pumps generate a pulsed discharge of a fluid in the form of a pulse wave. The first pulsed discharge is formed by a motor which rotates a pair of rollers. The pulsed discharge consists of a series of superimposed pulses. The first pulse has a greater amplitude, and a first peak pressure, and includes a first portion in which the rollers are spaced apart, and a second portion in which the rollers are in contact. The second pulse of the pulsed discharge has a smaller amplitude and a second peak pressure. The pressure created by the first pulse is transmitted to a reservoir of medication and causes the medication to be injected into the body. As pressure decreases in the reservoir, air enters the reservoir and forces medication from the reservoir. After a time period, the pressure in the reservoir is reduced to a level at which the medication is expelled
