I was reading this quote from Joel Spolsky's tome Joel on Software and I read the following: At the end of the year, Stack Overflow is going to run out of characters. This seemed pretty obvious for some reason, but reading it made me ask myself: How is it that a site that's built for answering questions about programming is now going to run out of characters? I mean, yes I'm aware of the many, many hacks that have been put into the system to try and avoid overflows, but why does the specification have to be so small and how is it related to programming questions? A: He probably meant to say that Stack Overflow is going to have character limits imposed on it. A: Stack Overflow is not a forum, it is a Q&A site. The top 100,000 questions are available as of March 24, 2012. How are you going to run out of characters when there are only 100,000 questions? A: There's a direct link to the question limit (though as you see by the comments, Joel has since changed his tune). The Stack Overflow engine is built to take on 100,000 questions per year.
