In 2013, the gross national income per person was US$4,780, ranking the country 109th among 189 countries (see: List of countries by GNI per capita). Indeed, between the year 2000 and 2013, Indonesia's per capita GDP grew at an average of 5.96% annually, ranked 67th in the world (by contrast, the US was ranked 14th with a 6.75% annual rate of growth). However, this prosperity is not evenly distributed: Indonesia's 2004 GDP per capita of US$4,038 per person compares to the regional average (including the 10 ASEAN countries) of US$4,626 and a global average of US$6,371. The urban-to-rural ratio of the population is also skewed, with 22% of the total population being urban and 78% being rural (for comparison, this same ratio in 2005 was 18.8% and 80.2%). To compensate for inequality, the government provides certain social welfare services to the less well-off. In 2009, the Ministry of Health estimated the per capita social spending to be US$70, compared to an average of US$127 for other countries in Southeast Asia. Budget The 2013/2014 budget for the government was US$119.4 billion. There are three budgets: the medium term budget, which covers the period from 2011 to 2015, the short term budget, covering from 1 January to 31 December each year, and the regular budget, which covers the period from 1 January to 31 December every other year. To finance the government, the government collects three funds (Parastatal) and one fund (Private): Finance Ministry - Central Government - State Government - Private Sector - UNB Each fund is financed by its budget allocation, user charges, and deposits collected from the private sector. The Central Government and State Government's spending are allocated based on a formula. In 2013, State Government's budget was the largest at 47.9% of total government spending, Central Government's at 35%, and the Finance Ministry's budget at 17.4% (for comparison, Finance Ministry's budget was 16.2% in 2005). The total budget of 2013 is estimated to

As the official handbook puts it, "An earthquake has to be the most difficult thing to build a tunnel through." Scaling icebergs and maintaining a constant distance from jagged crevasses are no problem, but an underground river of glacial meltwater descending from the glacier can be like a dam. At the bottom of the tunnel, the water is surrounded by a crust of ice, and scientists say it would take fifty years to cut through all of this. In the afternoon, a car hurtles toward the tunnel from a distance. The drive to the conference takes longer than I expected, and the tunnel proves even more interesting than I had expected. The tunnel begins with a shaft that drops beneath the massive Mendenhall Glacier. The temperature here is always -3°C, and the air pressure is a scant 0.1 percent of the air pressure at sea level. It's a delicate environment, and the ground is constantly moving. The thick air weighs down the surrounding earth, slowing the glacier's descent. The ground shifts so often that the tunnel must be dug and sealed at a different spot every day. Dylan, the geologist leading the conference, points out a high-frequency vibration in the walls, and the noise of a crushing glacier. From his perspective, the glacier is a single mass of ice, held back by the walls of the tunnel. Other tunnels stretch beyond the reach of his cameras, bringing supplies to the railway crew. According to the geologist, the main power source is a huge diesel engine in a kind of barnlike shed halfway up the tunnel, where the river of meltwater enters the earth. There's a ladder next to the lights, and the geologist leads us up into the darkness. The lights hurt my eyes; I blink, and I 648931e174
