When Google announced its plan to retire its blogger program last month, the company reminded webmasters that blogger's SSL is not affected by the changes. The announcement came as no surprise to webmasters who use WordPress (or any other secure blogging platform) with a paid SSL certificate, but many who use free SSL had not previously considered the problem of being inactive in the Google+ blog network. Google+ recently announced that it will retire its blogger platform and that all blogs will be migrated to the new Google+ platform. The exact date is unknown, but Google says it will be "very soon". However, there has been no confirmation from Google or from WordPress whether blogs using a free SSL will be affected by this migration. Using a free SSL with your WordPress blog is not strictly an issue – but it does cause problems. Google+ SSL and Search When the domain name +.blogspot.com is accessed through Google's search results, it links to Google+. Google's blog network uses SSL encryption and Google+. SSL connections are protected by Google, so the security issues of not having an SSL are not relevant for the users. Migrating from a free SSL to paid SSL will most likely mean that your blog will lose its ranking in the Google SERPs. However, when Google+ first announced its plan to migrate blogs to the platform, the company had also assured webmasters that blogs will not lose their rankings when they are moved to Google+. It looks like this is not the case and Google+ blogs using a free SSL will lose their rankings when they are moved. Free SSL and Search There is also a problem with a free SSL and the way that the Google Search bots access it. Browsers like Chrome or Safari automatically activate SSL on a website and ask the owner to confirm that they want to access c6a93da74d
